Person Centred Support A Guide for Service Users

Useful information for service users who got involved in The Standards We Expect project about person centred support

March 2008

Written by Peter Beresford, Catherine Bewley, Fran Branfield, Jabeer Butt, Suzy Croft, Michael Glynn, Kiran Dattani Pitt, Jennie Fleming, Ronny Flynn, Charles Patmore, Karen Postle and Michael Turner

This information pack is for the service users who came to our training workshops and took part in our project. We want to share some useful information and good ideas to help you get the services and lives you want.

The Standards We Expect project ends on 30 June 2008. Up to then you can contact:

1. What Is Person Centred Support?

Person centred support means you are at the centre of your service. Services should work with you to help you live your life in the way you want.

Our project found that there are 8 important things about person centred support. They are:

1. Choice and Control

This means being in charge of your life and having support to make decisions.

2. Setting Goals

This means deciding what you want to do or change in your life.

3. Good Relationships

It is important to have good relationships with family members, friends, the people who work with you and other people. They help make things happen and help you to feel part of your community.

4. Listening

Services and the people who work for services need to listen to you to make person centred support happen.

5. Information

Having the right information you need in the way you want it is very important. It can be difficult to make good choices without it.

6. Being Positive

Being positive is important. It helps you feel more in control of your life. You can usually make better choices when you feel positive.

7. Learning

Person centred support helps you try new things and learn new skills.

8. Flexibility

Person centred support is about services being flexible enough to fit your life. It is not about 'one-size fits all' or giving everyone the same service.

2. What is the Social Model of Disability?

Over the last 30 years, disabled people have come together to fight for rights and equality.

Disabled people have started their own organisations to help each other and campaign for change.

An important part of this campaign is an idea called the social model of disability, or the barriers approach to disability.

This idea looks at the way people and society make disabled people's lives difficult. These are barriers like poor access to buildings, treating people unfairly at school, college or work, and not having the right services and support.

Looking at disability in this way challenges the idea that disability is about what people cannot do because of their medical problems or conditions.

It is also called the 'equalities' approach because it's about having the same life chances and opportunities as everyone else. It's about what society, organisations and people need to do to make equal chances happen.

This project looked at services from this barriers and equalities approach.

The project thinks that person centred services are about helping people to live their lives as they want to. To do this they need to have choice and control over the support that they get.

3. Helping Each Other

It can be really good to meet other service users to share stories, experiences, ideas and action.

We can make things change better and faster if we work together. We are more powerful together.

There are several ways to find out how to meet other service users where you live.

You can look at the SOLNET website run by Shaping Our Lives. This website lists over 200 organisations of people who use services. It also has information about events and opportunities to get involved:

4. Your Rights

Your Right to Make Decisions

There is a new law called the Mental Capacity Act. This new law is all about choices and decisions about your life. This could be about small daily choices – like what to wear and what to eat – to bigger choices – like where to live.

The new law says:

- You have a right to make your own choices and decisions.
- You have the right to make decisions even if other people disagree with you
- Other people have to support you as much as possible to make your own choices.
- No one should think you can't make decisions because of:
 - your age
 - how you look
 - how you behave
 - you are disabled
 - you can't make big decisions
 - or if you couldn't make a decision in the past.

Your Right to Equality

There is a law called the Disability Discrimination Act. It says you should not be treated unfairly because you are disabled.

This law is about things like:

- shops and services
- health and social care
- school and college
- getting a job
- renting or buying a house.

Employers and organisations that provide any type of goods or services are breaking the law if they treat a disabled people in a different way to other people because of their impairment or disability.

Services must make 'reasonable adjustments' to make something accessible or easier for you to use. This might cover things like:

- putting in a ramp to make a building accessible
- providing disability awareness training for staff
- providing an interpreter for deaf people.

Public organisations - like councils, colleges, and public transport services - must have a policy that says what they will do to make disabled people more equal in their services.

If you have been treated unfairly you can:

- tell the people running the service how they could make things better
- tell the people running the service that the Equality and Human Rights Commission can help
- ask the Equality and Human Rights Commission for help.

Your Human Rights

There is a law called the Human Rights Act. This law gives everyone in the country rights as human beings. It puts these rights under headings called 'Articles'.

Article 2 - The right to life

You have the right not to be killed and to have your life protected. This covers protection from hate crime.

Article 3 - The right not to be treated in cruel, inhuman or degrading ways

Services and support staff must work with you in ways that respect your dignity and humanity.

Article 5 - The right to freedom and to be safe

Services should not unlawfully restrict your freedom and should act against bullying or hate crime.

Article 8 - The right to respect for private and family life

You have the right to live in the same way as everyone else in your community. This is an important right for disabled people who are sometimes only offered housing and services with groups of other disabled people. It is also an important right about getting married, getting support to be a parent and for taking part in your local community.

Article 9 -The right to have a religion and to have your own ideas

You have a right to follow your own beliefs and have your own ideas.

Article 10 -The right to say what you think

You have the right to speak out, even if other people disagree with you.

Article 11 – The right to freedom of association

Services should not stop you from going out and meeting other people.

Article 14 -The right not to be discriminated against

You have the right not to be treated badly because of being a woman or a man, black or white, having a disability or for any other reason.

The Human Rights Act also says you have the right to keep and enjoy your own things (Protocol 1, Article 1) and the right to education (Protocol 1, Article 2).

Your Right to Services and Support

Under the Community Care Act of 1990 you have a legal right to have an assessment to see if you need services.

If the assessment says you need a service and you fit your local authority's eligibility criteria, then you have a legal right to get a service.

Eligibility criteria are a list of rules set by national and local government to say who can get a service and who can't. National government calls this Fair Access to Care.

5. Your Services

Service users are not always told who provides and who pays for their service. It is important to know who controls your service if you want to make changes. It is also helpful if you can find a worker who is on your side and will help you make changes happen.

Ask your social worker or support worker to help you find out who provides and pays for your services.

Getting What You Need

If you need support to live your life independently you can talk to your local social services department (Adult Care). You can ask for a Community Care Assessment.

A Social Worker will come to see you. The Social Worker will ask you questions to find out what support you need. They might provide:

- support at home
- help with changes or adaptations to where you live
- support to do things during the day, like go to college
- meals.

If you think you need help during your assessment, or you disagree with an assessment, then contact your local service user organisation or advocacy organisation. They should have experience of supporting people through assessments and what to do if you disagree with an assessment.

If you and your social worker agree with the amount of support you need, then you should think about how you want to receive that support. Do you want to manage the money yourself (with help if you need it) so you can organise your own support? Do you want to get support from a provider that you already know about?

You don't have to have the service your social worker offers. Get help from your local service user organisation or brokerage organisation.

If you already get a service but you don't agree with the amount of service you get or you don't like the service, then contact your social worker or get help from an independent organisation.

Getting Involved and Taking Part

Some people want to get involved in how their service is run and organised.

Service providers should have ways for users to get involved in this way if they want to. Having service users involved in a service is a good way to change things when a service needs to be made better.

Some service users enjoy getting involved like this and can get a lot from the experience. You can feel like you are doing something useful and helping to improve services and make things better for other people.

There are lots of ways to get involved. For example:

- help to interview and choose support staff
- join a service consultation group
- join a tenants or residents group
- go to meetings, workshops and conferences with service bosses
- help train staff and service people
- campaign for changes with an independent advocacy or service user organisation
- join a local Partnership Board.

A lot of service users start to get involved when they have a problem that they need to sort out. When they do this they find that there are other ways to get involved as well. Getting involved can be a good way to learn new things, make friends, and talk about things with other people.

If you are not sure whether to get involved, why not give it a try? Once you get started, you should get the chance to suggest new ideas and try different ways of doing things.

Sometimes you can get paid for taking part - though this can be difficult if you get benefits. There are strict rules about getting paid while you are receiving benefits.

The person who helps you with your services - your social worker or support worker - should know about what their service does to involve service users. If they don't know, ask them to find out.

In some places there are independent organisations that deal with user involvement - some will be run by service users.

Contact the SOLNET website to find your local user controlled organisation - www.solnetwork.org.uk.

Shaping Our Lives will be publishing a resource pack for service users and service providers on all aspects of user involvement in summer 2008. Contact them on Tel: 0845 241 0383.

You can also find out about local groups by contacting your local council for voluntary service. The National Association for Voluntary and Community Action will be able to give you a contact in your area.

6. Your Support Money

Direct Payments

One way to get more control over the money spent on your support is to get a direct payment.

With direct payments, Adult Services give you all or part of the money for your service. You choose the best way to spend the money to meet your needs.

Lots of people use their direct payment to employ their own support workers. This gives people a person centred service because they are in control of it. This might sound difficult but you can get help to set up a direct payment and to manage the money. You don't have to do it all yourself.

The best place to get help is from your local independent direct payments support organisation or local disabled people's organisation.

Email: info@ncil.org.uk

Individual Budgets

Individual budgets are another way of getting control over the money for your support. Individual budgets are new but they are spreading across the country.

Individual budgets start with your personal support plan, which you decide on (with help if you need). This looks at your whole life and what support you need to live it.

The individual budget for your support comes from different places. You use the money to pay for the support, equipment or activities you need to live your life.

You can get help from a social worker or an advocate or broker who can help you decide how to spend the money. They can help set up your support in the way you want.

You can have the money as a direct payment, so it comes to you, or you can ask your Adult Services department to arrange things for you.

To find more contact your local Adult Services or service user organisation (see the SOLNET website at www.solnetwork.org.uk).

Benefits

You are probably entitled to a number of state benefits. How much you get will depend on things like your housing, whether you have savings, whether you live on your own and whether you have children.

There are benefits to help with things like daily living, housing costs, council tax and childcare. If you are not sure what benefits you get or could get, ask someone to help you find out.

You should control how your benefits are spent, with support if necessary, unless you have someone who has been given a legal responsibility to manage your money for you.

Benefits can be complicated. To find out more and get advice, you need to contact a specialist advisor, such as:

7. Your Housing

What Choices are there?

People live in all sorts of ways and all sorts of housing.

Most people live in one of the following:

- a home that they own and pay for
- a home that they rent from a local authority, housing association or other landlord
- a residential home
- someone else's home (usually a family member or friend).

People can live alone, with the families they grew up with or the friends and families they make as adults.

Some disabled people are not happy about where they live. They are not given a choice about where they live or who they live with.

9. The Standards We Expect Project

The Standards We Expect project is a research and development project paid for by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation. It started in 2005 and ends in June 2008.

This project is about person centred support. This means services that put the person at the centre. The project wanted to find out how to make person centred services happen better and faster across the country.

The project worked in eight areas across the United Kingdom. The work in each area was different, depending on what was happening in each area and what people wanted to do.

In each area, the project asked:

- What does person centred support mean for people?
- What stops it from happening?
- What helps it to happen?

We worked with service users, carers, staff and organisations. But the project worked most closely with service users and staff because what they say is often not listened to.

The project ran national 'Get Togethers' and training workshops for everyone.

The project was run by a group of four organisations and four individuals, led by Shaping Our Lives, the national service user network. The other partners were Values Into Action, the Centre for Social Action at De Montfort University and the Centre for Citizen Participation at Brunel University.

We also worked with a network of twelve more organisations which were part of the project to support change more widely.

A major book about the project will be published in late 2008. This book will include lots of useful materials, references and contact information.
